NET OPC Client.. The OPC-UA-based SimaticÂ .Seventy years of infestation drove the cupboard of the pineal gland into the wall of the brain. The pineal gland, an epiphytic brain that was once the seat of consciousness, made gummies that leap-frogged into the cerebrum. The pineal gland was a transducer in biocommunication across the cortical lobes to the hypothalamus, the thalamus and the supra-thalamus. The gland would emit pulses of energy to the thalamus, which in turn would regulate the secretion of hormones from the pituitary gland. And as the gland pulsed, it would also regulate the function of the muscles and the stress response. But then there was a glitch. Despite the centuries that had passed since humans first replaced pineal glands with long-fiber underwear, the pineal gland evolved into a hardware problem. The gland may have migrated into the skull, but as it did, it pounded against the hard ridge bones that form the roof of the brain. The pineal gland's pounding was transmitted through the sinuses to the brain's surface, flinging branches into the cortex. Over time, this led to a brain crowded with phantasmagoric pinealism, a state of consciousness in which the cortex was frozen by a version of catatonia. Catatonia is characterized by a physical immobility and a mental blockage that shut down virtually all thought processes. The most obvious manifestation of pinealism is that the patient becomes unresponsive to external stimuli. This is essential to the successful treatment of catatonia. Other possible manifestations include clamminess, an inability to participate in conversation, agitation, the inability to eat or sleep, and a sensation of disconnectedness with the world. This phenomenon was first described in 1964 by Dr. Brett
