Provide a solution manual for the following exam in pdf. There are problems with this. One problem is that a GM doesn't know how to run a campaign world. If the GM says there are goblins on the border of the dungeon, that the goblins are level 2 (why should they be level 2?) and goblins have a small town, that's fine. But then the GM has to figure out how to make the goblins and the town fit within the campaign world. Now that doesn't necessarily mean the GM has to throw away everything and start over. The GM can start by mapping out the relationship between the area they gave the goblins and the campaign world. "Here are the farms. There is a village. There is a swampy wilderness. The goblins are in the wilderness and there are no farms there." Then you describe what's happening in the village. "The village is full of high born warriors, and the little town is full of farmers." The GM can now set in stone exactly how the goblins are placed in the campaign world. Two things need to happen though. There needs to be a clear relationship with the campaign world, and players need to know this relationship. That takes some
