I have built a simple PLL based clock, but the sound going out of sync occurs at the same time, as well as when the master clock is turned on or off. How do I control audio to prevent this? A:

It sounds like your audio is being connected to a surface attached to a chip that has a lot of digital and analog circuitry. As long as the clock accuracy is good enough that the audio is always synced with the digital data, the DAC (Digital to Analogue converter) should not be a problem. Unfortunately though, often the audio and digital signals are going to the same chip. When you look at the data sheet for the chip, you'll see that it has an "Audio Clock" line to the analog audio output. That audio clock is usually a regular crystal clock running at a fixed rate. By setting that rate to the same frequency as your digital clock source (processor clock etc), you should be able to accurately synchronize the two. If the chips that handle the data and audio are on separate chips, like a video card and a sound card, then they're probably connected together via a buffer, like a FIFO. In this case, you'll have to set your DAC as a slave and use a buffer (faster than real time) to send the audio to the DAC. If you have the clock and data on the same
